President-elect Donald Trump called BuzzFeed a ‘failing pile of garbage’ over the report that Moscow has been blackmailing him over past sex adventures in Russia. He also refused to answer a question from CNN, another outlet that published the report.

“Be quiet. I’m not going to give you a question. You are fake news,” Trump told CNN reporter Jim Acosta at the press conference in New York on Wednesday, where he announced transferring the company to his sons to avoid conflicts of interest.

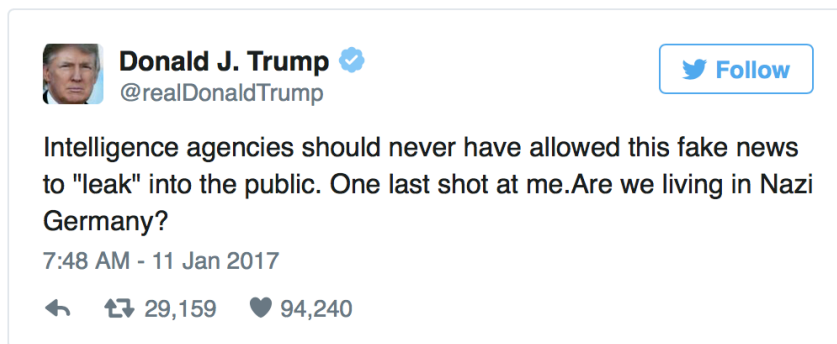

On Tuesday, CNN reported that a memo claiming that Russia had compromising materials on Trump was shared with the outgoing president and the president-elect by the US intelligence community.

Later in the day, BuzzFeed News published the entire set of memos, which were purportedly “prepared for political opponents of Trump by a person who is understood to be a former British intelligence agent.” The dossier had been circulating among elected officials, journalists and the intelligence community for weeks, according to BuzzFeed's Ken Bensinger.

Included in the report was the accusation that Trump has "personal obsessions and sexual perversion," including for graphic sex acts.

"It is disgraceful" that the US intelligence agencies allowed the two-page report that was "false and fake and never happened" to be made public, Trump said of the report published by BuzzFeed, which he called a "filing pile of garbage."

CNN, which also published the report, said that they tried to get a comment on the story from Trump's team for "more than half a day."

"What I suspect you're seeing here is an attempt to discredit" genuine news sources, said CNN host Jake Tapper immediately after Trump's press conference.

Tapper added that he could understand why the president-elect was upset by uncorroborated accusations being posted on the internet.

"I would be too," he said. "That's why we didn't publish any of the details."

Acosta later tweeted that he got another reporter to ask the question. He told CNN that Trump's spokesman Sean Spicer threatened to eject him from the press conference if he tried asking another question.

Fortunately ABC's Cecilia Vega asked my question about whether any Trump associates contacted Russians. Trump said no.

CNN has sought some distance from BuzzFeed on Wednesday, saying they were “fully confident” in their own reporting and calling on Trump and his team to “identify, specifically, what they believe is inaccurate” in the network’s coverage.

From a CNN spokesperson

CNN’s decision to publish carefully sourced reporting about the operations of our government is vastly different than BuzzFeed’s decision to publish unsubstantiated memos. The Trump team knows this. They are using BuzzFeed’s decision to deflect from CNN’s reporting, which has been matched by the other major news organizations. We are fully confident in our reporting. It represents the core of what the First Amendment protects, informing the people of the inner workings of their government; in this case, briefing materials prepared for President Obama and President-elect Trump last week. We made it clear that we were not publishing any of the details of the 35-page document because we have not corroborated the report’s allegations. Given that members of the Trump transition team have so vocally criticized our reporting, we encourage them to identify, specifically, what they believe to be inaccurate.
