Rafael Rivera - who served in the U.S. Army for seven years - writes:

The police in Ferguson have better armor and weaponry than my men and I did in the middle of a war. And Ferguson isn't alone — police departments across the US are armed for war.

The Hill notes:

[Senator] McCaskill pointed out that in some places local police departments are more heavily armed than the National Guard.

Business Insider points out:

Someone identifying himself as an 82nd Airborne Army veteran, observing the Ferguson police scene, comment[ed] that “We rolled lighter than that in an actual warzone”

Constitutional and civil rights lawyer John Whitehead notes that homeland security officers within the U.S. have three times as much ammunition as front-line soldiers in Afghanistan (and possess a type of ammunition that is banned in war zones).

Huffington Post reports:

Many combat veterans have since pointed out that the SWAT officers are more heavily armed and outfitted than they themselves were while patrolling the streets of Iraq or Afghanistan.

Indeed, many veterans have noted that American police are more heavily armed than they were when serving on the front lines:

The gentleman on the left has more personal body armor and weaponry than I did while invading Iraq. pic.twitter.com/5u6Txylbkk

@joanmccarter My troops were never as well equipped, nor as poorly trained or disciplined as they are. This is something else. @dailykos — soonergrunt (@soonergrunt) August 14, 2014

@inteldump @CaptainAwwsum @AthertonKD those mraps are a hell of alot more advanced then we had in 06-07 OR 09-10 — Charles Bragg (@CharlieB4Real) August 14, 2014

I don't know how it was in IRQ and AFG, but in Bosnia we had less firepower while on patrol than the cops in #Ferguson

We've decided, as a society, that local police forces need greater armor capabilities than an invasion force in 2003.

Indeed, the extreme militarization of American police is as anti-American as it gets.
