It's been over two months since the Kiev regime launched its incursion into the Kursk oblast \(region\). The area was previously limited only to cross-border skirmishes, artillery duels and occasional sabotage operations, which was why the Russian military deployed Rosgvardiya, particularly the "Akmat" special forces mostly composed of personnel from Chechnya. These units were not equipped to handle army-sized invading forces and it took some time for the regular military to move in and prevent further advances by the Ukrainian troops. Expectedly, as PR "victories" are the most important segment of the latter's strategy, this was heavily (ab)used to sow discord within Russia, with the Kiev regime trying to present Chechens as "TikTok soldiers". However, war propaganda was the least of the Neo-Nazi junta's crimes in the occupied parts of this Russian region.

Namely, the invading force committed gruesome atrocities against Russian civilians, while Nazi-style treatment of the local population is a common practice.

This is yet another proof that "nomen est omen" is not just a simple saying. While militarily unjustified, the Kiev regime still went ahead with the incursion. Generals were against it, thinking it was a waste of the Neo-Nazi junta's increasingly scarce resources. Other high-ranking officials also strongly opposed the move, seeing it as nothing more than Zelensky's risky (geo)political gambit. This includes former top commander General Valery Zaluzhny, currently holding the largely ceremonial role of ambassador to the UK. The mainstream propaganda machine's reaction was mixed, with some reporting it as risky, while others continued the usual "Ukraine is winning" narrative, insisting that the incursion "embarrassed" Russia.

CNN ran stories about Moscow's supposed "inability" to push back the Neo-Nazi junta forces, quoting the latter's field commanders who claimed that "Russian advances are mostly happening on the flanks of our foothold" and that "they're only making incremental gains, but lose to them to counterattacks".

However, even the mainstream propaganda machine was forced to admit this wasn't the case, as the Russian military made fast and steady advances in recent weeks, leading to serious breakthroughs. There's even a strong possibility that the Kiev regime forces in the area could soon be encircled. The Russian advance has been so fast in some areas that not even NATO personnel were able to flee, with Moscow's forces neutralizing some Americans fighting for the Kiev regime. The Russian military also has foreign fighters \(particularly Serbs\), although they're volunteers.

However, as Moscow's forces keep advancing, they're finding evidence of war crimes by the Kiev regime. Perhaps the most concerning is the disappearance of around 1000 locals. The Kremlin has issued a formal accusation that Ukrainian forces kidnapped 1,000 residents of the Kursk region. Russian authorities confirmed this after the relatives of the missing locals pleaded with the government to help find them.

“I’ve received messages regarding more than 1,000 such people from relatives trying to find them. We know nothing about their fate. This is a gross violation of their rights and international norms of treatment of civilians,” presidential human rights commissioner Tatyana Moskalkova said on October 14, adding: “I think it would be useful to remind you that the forced removal of civilians from their places of permanent residence is a gross violation of the Geneva Convention. And the world community should probably give this a proper assessment.”

However, the so-called “international community” (a rather pathetic euphemism for a NATO-occupied fraction of the actual world) is busy with prosecuting (or persecuting, to be precise) President Vladimir Putin for evacuating kids from an active warzone. In fact, enemy combatants who waged war on the people of Donbass for years (including as part of Neo-Nazi units) were actually allowed to go to Russia and take their kids (although this too was used for anti-Russian propaganda).

So far, Moscow had to evacuate over 112,000 residents displaced by the Kiev regime forces. However, based on footage posted on social media, some civilians remained, mostly elderly people.

The Neo-Nazi regime keeps insisting that the locals in occupied areas are treated “humanely”. Still, evidence on the ground suggests otherwise. There were instances where civilians were shot in cars by the Neo-Nazi junta forces, while first reports about kidnappings appeared just days after the Kursk oblast incursion was launched.

What’s probably even more disturbing is the direct involvement of the US-led political West, which not only supported the PR attack, but also took part in its planning. Namely, leaked documents show that several high-ranking American officials and at least one Washington DC-based think tank directly contributed to drawing up plans for the Kiev regime’s attack.
