

Labor Day: Building a Better World

Want an Exciting Career? Become a Labor Organizer

By Sherwood Ross

Global Research, September 02, 2010

2 September 2010

Region: USA

Theme: History

If you're seeking an exciting career that's really fraught with risk and danger and that makes the world a better place, forget about joining the Army: become a labor organizer!

You'll be called upon to risk your job and your life and to face unjust jail terms for organizing on behalf of your fellow man and woman, with no way to fight back against thugs with guns, tear gas, and billy clubs except by using your wits.

Let's compare the careers of Army officers and labor organizers to see which actually comes closer to fulfilling that wonderful slogan of the Army's: "Be all you can be."

Advertising in the August 26th issue of "The Miami Hurricane," the student newspaper of the University of Miami, a typical Army ad seeks to enroll students in the Reserve Officers Training Corps (ROTC) with glib generalities such as "Start Taking Charge," "Start Leading" and "Start Getting Ahead of the Game." The ad promises ROTC leads to an Army Officer's commission after graduation and "With a start like that, there's no limit to what you can achieve."

What the ad doesn't say is that if you're new to the Army you won't be taking charge of much of anything. You'll be taking orders, not giving them. You won't be leading, either; you'll be following. And what exactly does "Getting ahead of the game" mean? Once enrolled, will you be playing games? Is that what's going on in Afghanistan?

Whereas a union organizer can quit any time for any reason, once you've enlisted you're stuck for years and could face jail if you don't want to serve.

What's more, the Army fights at the whim of the White House and Congress—and they've given the Pentagon authority to gad about the globe forging ties with tyrants and making illegal invasions that disgrace USA in the eyes of the world, if not in the eyes of Army recruiters.

Keep in mind, too, the Army recruitment pitch is all about you. By contrast, a union organizer works to serve others. A recent help wanted ad posted on the Internet by the Service Employees International Union Local 105 of Denver, Colo., which includes many health care workers, called for an organizer who will "Train leaders to educate and agitate other workers about their job rights and other social issues, and motivate them into action." The ad says the organizer must have "A demonstrated commitment to social and economic justice." Army recruitment ads say nothing of the kind, of course. They stress "strength."

Asked about her job satisfactions as a former representative for state employee members of Local 1039 of the Communications Workers of America in Trenton, N.J., Dolores Curry, of Sacramento, Calif., said, "Often, I was able to get (workers') a benefit that was denied them such as sick leave. The union gives workers a voice and gives them a sense of dignity where before it was hopeless for them to redress their grievances."

If you work in American-occupied Iraq, for example, you'll need lots of dedication. The ministry in charge of electricity just barged into all the offices of the electrical union, turned out the lights, and shut them down. Nations like Colombia and Guatemala, with close ties to the U.S., have the worst records of all on workers' rights. Of course, it may all be just coincidence that wherever USA goes, trade unions suffer. Those attempting to suppress the union movement have lost sight of the fact that paying workers more is what energizes an economy, leading to a broader prosperity and, in the long term, to higher profits for owners as well.

In Colombia, where hunting season on trade unionists is open all year, Reuters quoted an International Labor Organization (ILO) official who said 96 per cent of the cases of violence against unionists there go unpunished. "In 2009 Colombia remains the most dangerous place on the face of this planet for workers," the wire service quoted Stanley Gacek, an American on an ILO committee concerned with such matters.

"The climate of fear fed by killings, abductions and other violence meant only 4 percent of Colombia's 18 million workers are union members, and only 1.2 percent have been able to negotiate their working conditions, according to Tarsicio Mora Godoy, president of the Colombia United Workers Federation CUT," Reuters said.

Globally, only one of 10 workers are unionized, so that of 2.8-billion employed, half are wage-slaves toiling for less than $2 a day. With some few notable exceptions—South Africa, Spain, and Chile—union membership is in decline in most countries, including the U.S., U.K., Australia, New Zealand and Israel, the ILO finds.

The choice is clear: without unions, the vast mass of workers will subsist as robots in a world of wage-slavery, of "haves" and "have nots," rather than having chance at making a decent living. Two of America's greatest figures understood the value of the working class. Abraham Lincoln once observed that "Labor is the superior of capital, and deserves much the higher consideration" and, of course, Martin Luther King was assassinated when he was in Memphis trying to help the sanitation workers.

This Labor Day, the choice is yours. Why not "be all you can be" by building a better world, not destroying it? Have you got what it takes to be a union organizer? # (Disclosure: the author in the past has worked as a public relations consultant to labor unions. Reach him at sherwoodross10@gmail.com)

The original source of this article is Global Research
Copyright © Sherwood Ross, Global Research, 2010

Comment on Global Research Articles on our Facebook page

Become a Member of Global Research

Articles by: Sherwood Ross

Disclaimer: The contents of this article are of sole responsibility of the author(s). The Centre for Research on Globalization will not be responsible for any inaccurate or incorrect statement in this article. The Centre of Research on Globalization grants permission to cross-post Global Research articles on community internet sites as long the source and copyright are acknowledged together with a hyperlink to the original Global Research article. For publication of Global Research articles in print or other forms including commercial internet sites, contact: publications@globalresearch.ca www.globalresearch.ca contains copyrighted material the use of which has not always been specifically authorized by the copyright owner. We are making such material available to our readers under the provisions of "fair use" in an effort to advance a better understanding of political, economic and social issues. The material on this site is distributed without profit to those who have expressed a prior interest in receiving it for research and educational purposes. If you wish to use copyrighted material for purposes other than "fair use" you must request permission from the copyright owner.

For media inquiries: publications@globalresearch.ca