The United States and South Korea will hold a massive joint military exercise this week aimed, at deterring aggression.

About 30,000 American troops and around 56,000 South Korean soldiers will take part in the 10-day annual Ulchi Freedom Guardian war games, which begin Monday and run through August 26.

The exercise comes a week after Seoul completed anti-submarine drills near a disputed west coast maritime border with North Korea that prompted Pyongyang to retaliate by firing a barrage of artillery shells in the same area.

Last month, the U.S. and South Korea held a joint navel exercise in the East Sea (Sea of Japan) after the sinking of the South Korean warship Cheonan....

Pyongyang has denied any responsibility for the sinking, which killed 46 South Korean sailors.

The naval and ground drills come just a week after the South completed submarine maneuvers near a disputed sea boundary. Those drills prompted the North to fire artillery shells in the same area.

Chinese Admiral Yang Yi warned last week that the maneuvers constitute what he called “a fresh provocation” to Beijing and the region.

North Korea, which routinely levels threats against the United States and South Korea, on Sunday called the maneuvers a “dangerous act” that could lead to a new war.
