Key provisions of the Patriot Act allowing for government surveillance programs have expired after the U.S. Senate failed to vote upon an extension.

Section 215 of the Patriot Act previously allowed for the bulk data collection, including phone records of Americans who were not even under investigation. RT reports that it was also ‘used to track financial data and to obtain companies’ internet business records’.

The so-called ‘lone wolf’ provision, allowing the targeting of those thought to be terrorists but not associated with a group, and the ‘roving wiretap’ provision, allowing the monitoring of a person irrespective of the devices used by them, also both expired.

Those against the spying programs see this as a major victory, but hardliners see this a blow to America’s national security.

RT reports that Republican Senator Dan Coats (R-Indiana) ‘claimed the terrorists were just waiting for a nuclear 9/11’, and John McCain (R-Arizona) said ‘we’re losing everywhere’.

Rand Paul (R-Kentucky), responsible for blocking the extension of the provisions, said “some people are secretly hoping for an attack, so they could blame it on me”.

With so many questions surrounding the original 9/11 attacks, it is worrying to have Senators almost anxiously waiting for a 'nuclear 9/11'. Earlier this year it was revealed that the CIA was involved in planting false nuclear documents and materials in Iranian nuclear sites, so who is to say an agency would not stage an attack to maintain and expand their dwindling powers?

A former U.S. intelligence officer just said most terrorist attacks are indeed false flag events to facilitate expansion of both powers and funding.

A false flag would only benefit the military industrial complex, who are now concerning themselves with finding a president capable of pursuing a 'strong foreign policy'. A 'nuclear 9/11' would almost certainly guarantee the pursuit of such a foreign policy, along with disastrous consequences for the future of humanity.
