The Guardian's Terrible Dilemma over Corbyn. Challenge to the "Red Neoliberals"

By Jonathan Cook, September 21, 2015

In Autumn 2002 the Observer newspaper's correspondent Ed Vulliamy found confirmation of a terrible truth many of us already suspected. In a world-exclusive, he persuaded Mel Goodman, a former senior CIA official who still had security clearance at the Agency, to go on record that the CIA knew there were no WMD in Iraq. Everything the US and British governments were telling us to justify the coming attack on Iraq were lies.

Down the Memory Hole: NYT Erases CIA's Efforts to Overthrow Syria's Government

By Adam Johnson, September 21, 2015

FAIR has noted before how America's well-documented clandestine activities in Syria have been routinely ignored when the corporate media discuss the Obama administration's "hands-off" approach to the four-and-a-half-year-long conflict. This past week, two pieces—one in the New York Times detailing the "finger pointing" over Obama's "failed" Syria policy, and a Vox "explainer" of the Syrian civil war—did one better: They didn't just omit the fact that the CIA has been arming, training and funding rebels since 2012, they heavily implied they had never done so.

It sounds quite reasonable, right?

The Media Response to the Growing Influence of the 9/11 Truth Movement.

By Elizabeth Woodworth, September 21, 2015

This more open approach taken in the international media – I could also have included the Japanese media – might be a sign that worldwide public and corporate media organizations are positioning themselves, and preparing their audiences, for a possible revelation of the truth of the claim that forces within the US government were complicit in the attacks – a revelation that would call into question the publicly given rationale for the military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Pakistan.
