In September 2015, anti-Bolivarian fascist coup plotter Leopoldo Lopez was sentenced to nearly 14 years in prison for inciting months of violence and related crimes against the state.

They resulted in 43 deaths, many injuries and destruction of public property. Lopez got off lightly. In America, he'd likely have been prosecuted and convicted of sedition, sentenced to decades or life in prison.

At the time, President Nicolas Maduro compared him to the 2002 coup plotters - calling him "the face of fascism."

Along with co-conspirators, he launched a US-supported La Salida (the Exit) campaign, openly calling for ousting Venezuela's government, inciting street violence to replace Bolivarian social democracy with fascist rule.

The Obama administration supported his criminality. His State Department irresponsibly called Venezuela's "judicial process and verdict" politically motivated - "to suppress and punish government critics."

The NYT, neocon/CIA-connected Washington Post and other media commented as expected - blasting Maduro for "persecuting" Lopez, claiming he acted in "desperation."

Why he was released to house arrest is unclear. He's free through cohorts to incite continued violence and other seditious acts - though his activities will likely be closely monitored, risking re-imprisonment if he steps too far out-of-line.

Commenting on his release, The NYT lied calling him a "political prisoner," ignoring his high crimes, falsely claiming his transfer to house arrest is "a sign that the government was starting to buckle in the face of months of public demonstrations and growing diplomatic isolation."

"This is a step toward freedom, not just Leopoldo's, but also a step that brings all Venezuelans closer to freedom," opposition fascist lawmaker Freddy Guevara blustered.

Lopez's lawyer Jared Genser said

"(n)ow is the time for sustained pressure on Maduro," claiming his client's release to house arrest "confirms that the relentless pressure is working" - a highly disputable comment.

In a statement released by Genser, Lopez said

"I am not willing to give up my fight for the freedom of Venezuela. And if that means that I must return to a cell in Ramo Verde, I am willing to do so."

If he resumes his criminality, he'll likely end up back where he belongs, along with other insurrectionist elements.

Venezuela's Supreme Court called his transfer to house arrest a "humanitarian gesture," citing unexplained health issues.

Venezuelan Defense Minister Vladimir Lopez said his release is evidence of Bolivarian "tolerance and dialogue."

The move comes at a time of likely US-orchestrated street violence since April, leaving scores dead, many others injured and hundreds arrested.

In June, US Senate legislation authorized $20 million for regime change in Venezuela, another $10 million for so-called "democracy building" Washington abhors.

Before taking office as secretary of state, Rex Tillerson said he'll "seek a negotiated transition to democratic rule in Venezuela" - code language for regime change.

Dark forces in Washington are likely plotting their next moves, aiming to replace Bolivarian fairness with fascist rule serving their interests - eliminating Venezuelan sovereign independence and gaining control over its immense oil reserves.

That's what years of US hostility toward the country is all about under Chavez and Maduro.
