US president Donald Trump appears to have backtracked on one his most controversial campaign platforms. During the campaign season, president Trump launched a bitter attack against the North Alliance Treaty, NATO, describing it as obsolete.

But on Wednesday, the president reversed his view on the military alliance, saying it's no longer obsolete. His attack against the NATO was one of his most controversial campaign promises, which caused a lot of unease among Washington's European allies. Trump however insisted that NATO members should pay more money for military budget of the military alliance.
